A fashion advertisement featuring a woman with dark hair styled in loose waves, wearing a black kurti with gold geometric embroidery on the chest and bell sleeves, paired with black palazzo pants. She is standing in a studio setting with a textured, reddish-orange wall behind her. She is looking off-camera to the left. She wears large green hoop earrings, a green ring, and a green cuff bracelet. Her shoes are orange and black. On the left side of the image, there is a large, stylized script logo for "Prakrit World". Below the logo, a paragraph of text provides historical context about the origin of the saree.

The Printed Saree has its birth in both South and North India. The word 'Sari' was taken from the Prakrit word 'sattrika' as written in the most primitive Jain and Buddhist texts. The first known portrayal of the saree in Indian is the figurine of an Indus valley priest wearing a drape,

It's CHARM

In early Indian tradition and the Natya Shastra (an ancient Indian treatise describing ancient dance and costumes), the navel of the Supreme Being is considered to be the starting place of existence and creativity; hence the midriff is to be left uncovered by the saree.
