In the 19th century, the English merchants of the Indian subcontinent, in search of raw materials, not only brought opium but also introduced to the region the opium trade, which had a profound impact on the region's economy and society. In the 19th century, the British government, in an effort to control the opium trade, passed the Opium Act of 1858, which gave the British government a monopoly over the opium trade in India. This act was a major step in the process of British imperialism in India, and it led to the opium wars between China and Britain. The opium trade was a major source of revenue for the British government, and it played a significant role in the development of the British Empire.
